Legends, along with sagas, folktales and fables reflect many of the stories of the ancient world, handed down to succeeding generations. They shape and are shaped by the folk memory of the many and diverse peoples and races, many long disappeared. As so little was written in olden times, perhaps on rocks, clay and wax tablets, parchments from plants and animal and so much of that was destroyed by time and conflict, much was passed down orally in recitation and song. Inevitably, over time, the stories mutate to reflect the ever-changing circumstances of daily life. So in these legends of Central Asia, there are accounts which have many versions, contradicting one another or even contradicting modern knowledge and research. Nevertheless, there is always something reflecting past events in the lives of people and societies and which have influenced the way we live and think today. As the conclusion of one of the articles so well describes legends, " they enrich the imagination and understanding of a people's past and identity.
